It's the true story of a Ugandan chess champion Phiona Mutesi, tracing her triumphant progress from hard knocks in an impoverished district of Kampala. While it is the same old story told beautifully, it is also a study of how success affects family ties, even in the slums of Uganda. It offers a realistic and very honest, for a Disney film, look at Africa with prostitution references and poor medical care reoccurring through the story. It is an inspiring story with great shots of children reacting to a world they have never seen before -- upper crust school, snow or the view from an airplane window.

Sultana (Project Ploughshares) and her family gave it a positive review. She should know as it was her home.
